What is a gastroscopy?

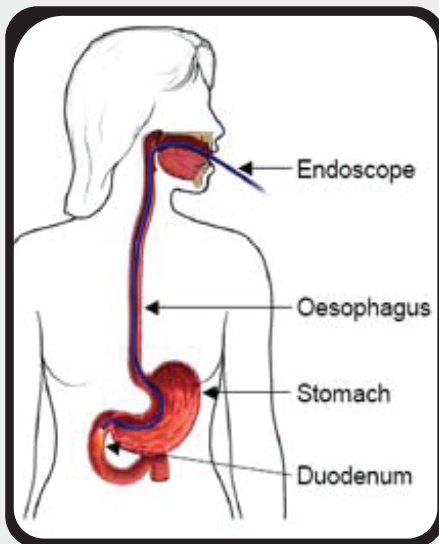

A gastroscopy is a test where a doctor looks into the upper part of your gut (the upper gastrointestinal tract). The upper gut consists of the oesophagus (foodpipe), stomach and duodenum. The doctor uses an endoscope to look inside your gut. Therefore, the test is sometimes called endoscopy.

Who needs a gastroscopy?

A gastroscopy may be advised if you have symptoms such as recurring indigestion, recurring heartburn, pains in the upper abdomen, repeated vomiting and difficulty swallowing.

The sort of conditions which can be confirmed (or ruled out) include:

- oesophagitis (inflammation of the oesophagus).
- duodenal or stomach ulcer.
- gastritis and duodenitis (inflammation of the stomach and duodenum).
- cancer of the stomach or oesophagus.

What is a colonoscopy?

A colonoscopy is a test where a doctor looks into your colon (large intestine or large bowel). The last part of the colon leads into the rectum where faeces (stools or motions) are stored before being passed out from the anus. A colonoscope is a thin, flexible, telescope. It is about as thick as a little finger.

Who needs a colonoscopy?

A colonoscopy may be advised if you have symptoms such as bleeding from the anus, pains in the lower abdomen, persistent diarrhoea, diarrhoea alternating with constipation (altered bowel habit) or other symptoms thought to be coming from the colon. The various conditions which can be confirmed include:

- Polyps of the colon.
- Cancer of the colon.
- Diverticula (pouches which form in the lining of the colon).
- Ulcerative colitis (which causes inflammation of the colon).
- Crohn's disease (also causes inflammation of the colon).

Patients who are above 50 years old or has a family member with cancer of the colon also need screening colonoscopy.
